Anna

"Aнна what is happening?" I asked concerned because I kept looking over my wing. It seemed she was having trouble keeping up. Anna's antennae narrowed as she squeaked, "My tummy is exploding and I have terrible gas." "Do you want to rest on this avocado tree?" I required scared. Anna landed on a leaf and her wings collapsed in exhaustion. She trembled and was sick. Frightened I examined what had come out and sure enough there were OE parasites wiggling in the hot mess.

"Aнна rest here I am off to find tropical milkweed," I hoped. Focus, focus, look for the orange and yellow blossoms, I told myself. All I saw was swamp milkweed, it smelled so good, I remembered how it tasted too, like ants on a cinnamon plant. I smelled it and my tummy rumbled. Over in the other yard, tropical milkweed! I circled back to Anna. "Anna" I cried. "I found tropical milkweed!"

Aнна fell, fluttering down into the swamp milkweed, resting and started to eat. "I am staying here," she mumbled. "You are going to die here, and don't you want your children to be healthy?" I asked. "Yes, but I'm tired," she replied. "You will be better if you come with me and eat some tropical milkweed," I said. "I'll even let you put your wait on me."

Aнна got flew up, put her arm around my neck and told me to take he to the tropical milkweed. When we got there she dropped onto the milkweed and took a big bit. Then she stuffed her face, ate faster than a running cheetah. Then she said, "I don't wanna my eggs." "You should get it out of the way, you can lay your eggs here so your babies won't get parasites too," I replied. "Fine," she said. When I flew away for a few minutes and came back there were eggs everywhere.
