Thomas E. Weisskopf (Ph.D. Economics, M.I.T., 1966) has taught at the Indian Statistical Institute, at Harvard University, and since 1972 at the University of Michigan (UM), where he is now Professor Emeritus of Economics. From 1996 to 2001 and from 2002 to 2005 he served as Director of the UM’s Residential College.

Professor Weisskopf's early research focused on issues of third world development and underdevelopment, with particular attention to India. In the late 1970s, his research interests shifted to the macroeconomic problems of advanced capitalist economies. In the 1990s he worked primarily on problems of economic transition and institutional development in the formerly socialist economies of the East, concentrating especially on the interaction between political and economic change in Russia. More recently he has worked on discrimination and affirmative action in the comparative context of the United States and India, and on the growth of economic inequality in each of these two countries.

Weisskopf has co-authored nine books, including (with Samuel Bowles and David M. Gordon) After the Waste Land: A Democratic Economics for the Year 2000 (M.E. Sharpe, 1991). His most recent book is Affirmative Action in the United States and India: A Comparative Perspective (Routledge, 2004). He has also published more than 100 articles in a wide range of journals in the fields of economic development, macroeconomics, comparative economic systems, political economy, and public policy.